

VOLUME ONE

Stone Soup

A Classic Tale Reimagined

The Village of Many Words

VOLUME ONE

Miss Ardent (AR-duhnt)

Enthusiastic or passionate; showing strong feelings or devotion.

"She was an ardent supporter of the local animal shelter, volunteering every weekend."

Mrs. Meticulous (muh-TIK-yoo-luhs)

Showing great attention to detail; very careful and precise.

"Her meticulous notes included every detail from the meeting, down to who sat where."

Mr. Vociferous (voh-SIF-er-uhs)

Vehement or clamorous; expressing opinions or feelings loudly and forcefully.

"The vociferous crowd at the game could be heard from three blocks away."

Mr. Tantamount (TAN-tuh-mownt)

Equivalent in seriousness or effect to; virtually the same as.

"Leaving the gate open with the dog in the yard was tantamount to letting him run away."

Little Miss Facetious (fuh-SEE-shuhs)

Treating serious issues with deliberately inappropriate humor; playfully joking.

"When asked if she wanted more vegetables, she gave a facetious reply about already having eaten her weight in broccoli."

Young Master Capricious

(kuh-PRISH-uhs)

Given to sudden and unaccountable changes of mood or behavior; unpredictable.

"The capricious weather changed from sunshine to rain three times before lunch."

STORY

An Old Classic Folktale, Retold for Today

DEDICATION

For all who have forgotten that the feast was never in the stone, but in the gathering.

And to all our children and grandchildren who have enjoyed this story, dad's stones, and the soup we've shared together.

In the Victorian era, daily conversation was rich with expressive language. Today, while we may recognize 40,000 words, we use only 1,000 to 3,000 in everyday speech. When we lose words, we lose awareness. This story invites you to rediscover the richness of language.

© 2020 Steven D. Mikel. All rights reserved.

This work is an original literary creation inspired by the traditional folktale 'Stone Soup,' which exists in the public domain. The specific text, characters, illustrations, and presentation are wholly original and protected by copyright.

Once upon a time, in a land not far from here, there was a country very much like our own. Cities and towns of all sizes were filled with people from many different places. The country had once been great, filled with thriving, active communities developing and sharing new ideas together and living in peace.

However, as their technology became more central to their culture, they spent less and less time outside, and less and less time with each other.

Mrs. Succinct (suk-SINGKT)

Briefly and clearly expressed; using few words to convey meaning.

"The teacher appreciated succinct answers that got straight to the point."

Mr. Elucidate (ih-LOO-sih-dayt)

To make something clear; to explain or shed light on a subject.

"The professor took time to elucidate the difficult concept until every student nodded in understanding."

Grandmother Prudent (PROO-duhnt)

Acting with or showing care and thought for the future; wise and careful in practical matters.

"It was prudent to bring an umbrella, even though the morning sky looked clear."

Words to Remember

The Characters & Their Meanings

Mr. Inquisitive (in-KWIZ-ih-tiv)

Having or showing an interest in learning things; curious and eager to investigate.

"My inquisitive daughter asked so many questions at the museum that the guide gave her a special tour."

Mrs. Vigilant (VIJ-ih-luhnt)

Keeping careful watch for possible danger or difficulties; watchful and alert.

"The vigilant crossing guard noticed the approaching car and held up her hand to stop traffic."

Young Lucid (LOO-sid)

Expressed clearly; easy to understand. Also: showing an ability to think clearly.

"Her lucid explanation of the math problem helped the whole class finally understand."

One day, a strange traveler entered one of these small towns, walking casually by himself upon the main road.

He was an average-looking man.

What was strange was what he carried.

Strapped across his shoulders was a massive copper cooking pot that appeared to be filled with various items. None of the townspeople had ever seen a traveler like him before.

So strange.

As he walked past home after home, and building after building, he stopped occasionally to look at the interesting things displayed as pictures in the many large windows: photos of beautiful smiling faces, shiny new vehicles, intelligent sayings, happy families, and even funny photos of family pets.

Every so often, he caught a glimpse of the townsfolk inside as they watched him walk by, but they disappeared quickly out of view. The stranger could feel all their curious eyes upon him as they wondered what he was doing in their town, but they all stayed comfortably behind each of their own windows.

Instructions

1. Place three clean stones in a large pot as a reminder of what brings us together.
2. Heat the pot over medium heat and add the olive oil.
3. Brown the meat cubes on all sides, working in batches if needed. Remove and set aside.
4. In the same pot, sauté the onion until translucent, about 5 minutes.
5. Season with salt and pepper, then add the turnips, potatoes, and carrots.
6. Pour in the water or broth, scraping up any browned bits from the bottom.
7. Bring to a boil, then reduce heat and simmer for 20 minutes.
8. Add cabbage, broccoli, cauliflower, radishes, and mushrooms. Return the meat to the pot.
9. Continue simmering for 15 minutes until vegetables are tender.
10. Add tomatoes and cook 5 more minutes.
11. Garnish with fresh parsley.
12. Serve in deep bowls, surrounded by good company.
13. Remember to remove the stones before serving... they've done their work of bringing everyone together.

The wonder was never in the stones... it was in the gathering, and in the gifts we each brought to share.

Stone Soup

A Recipe for Community

This recipe, like the story, works best when shared. Gather your family, invite your neighbors, and remember: the wonder was never in the stones.

PREP TIME	COOK TIME	SERVINGS
20 minutes	45 minutes	8-10 people

Ingredients

- 3 smooth, clean stones (well-washed, for tradition only)
- 2 tablespoons olive oil
- Salt and pepper to taste
- 1 large onion, diced
- 2 turnips, peeled and cubed
- 3 potatoes, cubed
- 3 carrots, sliced
- 1/4 head cabbage, chopped
- 1 cup broccoli florets
- 1 cup cauliflower florets
- 6-8 radishes, sliced
- 8 oz mushrooms, sliced
- 2 tomatoes, diced (or one 14oz can diced tomatoes)
- Fresh parsley, chopped
- 1 lb stew meat, cubed (beef, chicken, or vegetarian substitute)
- 8 cups water or broth

As the stranger reached the center of town, he noticed what must once have been a beautiful park. The park had long since gone unused, with the picnic area and flower beds now filled with weeds, and walking paths overgrown and barely seen. The playground swings, seesaws, spinning carousels, and climbing structures were all broken, rusty, and had been abandoned years before.

All the townsfolk, hiding, stared in disbelief as the traveler walked to the middle of the picnic area and began to unfasten the large copper pot from upon his back.

Setting it on the ground, he quietly took out a small gas stove, a large wooden spoon, a small bottle of olive oil, and a big jug of water. He set them aside on a nearby picnic table.

Then he placed the empty pot on the stove and turned on the flame, adjusting it to low.

The wonder was never in the stones.
The secret is remembering our uniqueness and individual purpose, created to be woven together in fellowship with God and one another.

"These," he whispered to himself, tucking them carefully into his leather pouch, "are very special stones from a very special place."

And with a small smile, the traveler walked on.

Somewhere ahead, another town was waiting.

Another community had forgotten itself.

Another pot of soup waited to be made.

The End.

Reaching into a leather pouch at his side, the traveler drew out three smooth, round stones.

He held them up to the fading sunlight, examining each one as though it were precious... turning them over in his hand, rubbing them softly.

Gently, reverently, he placed them into the warming pot and began to stir them with the wooden spoon.

Clunk. Clunk. Clunk.

So strange.

So strange, in fact, that one of the townsfolk... Mr. Inquisitive (in-KWIZ-ih-tiv)... came out to speak to him.

"Excuse me, kind sir," he said. "I'm curious... may I ask what you are doing?"

"Certainly," replied the traveler. "I am making stone soup."

"Stone soup?" queried Mr. Inquisitive (in-KWIZ-ih-tiv). "Is that really possible?"

"Why yes," exclaimed the traveler, and he stirred the stones once more.

Rattle, clatter, rattle!

"Stone soup! How curious!" gasped Mr. Inquisitive as he watched.

But the story does not quite end there.

As the traveler reached the edge of town, where the pavement gave way to dirt and the streetlights no longer reached, he paused.

He looked down at the ground. There, beside the road, were dozens of ordinary stones... river stones, garden stones, driveway stones.

He bent down and picked up three.

They were smooth. They were round. They were perfectly ordinary.

He held them up to the moonlight, turning each one over in his hand, rubbing them softly as if they were precious.

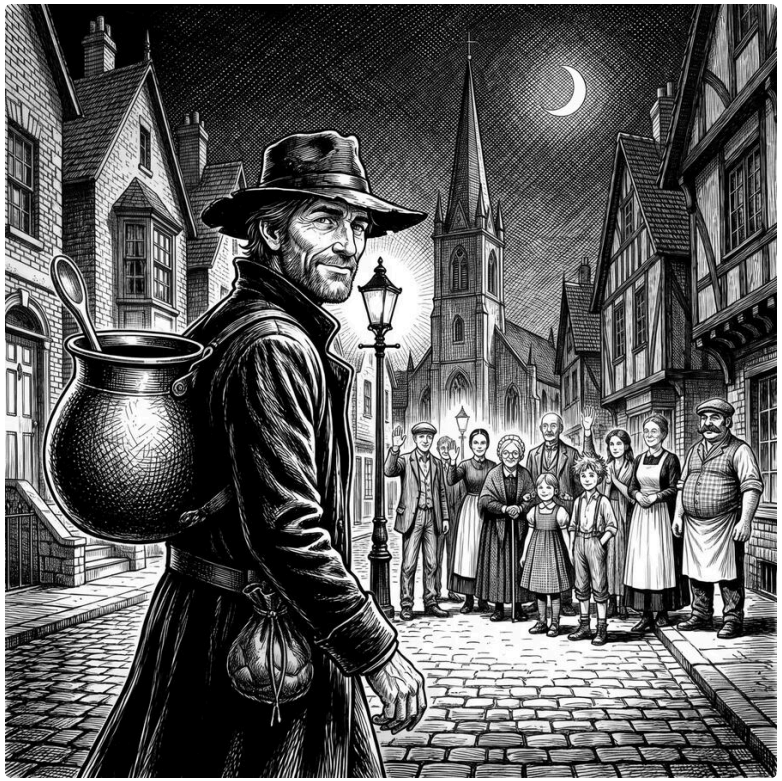

Mrs. Succinct nodded slowly. "The soup," she said, "brought us together."

"And remembering," the traveler added. "Remembering how to live... not beside each other, but with each other, and with Him who made us."

He fastened the copper pot to his back. It was lighter now, as though the weight it carried had been transferred to the hearts of those who remained.

The town gathered to see him off, waving and calling their thanks. And with that, the traveler walked toward the edge of town, disappearing into the darkness beyond the streetlights.

The traveler stopped stirring for a moment. He picked up the small bottle of olive oil and poured it over the stones until they glistened.

Then, from his pocket, he drew a worn wooden box marked "S" and "P." Mr. Inquisitive noticed that one end was marked with the letter S, and the other with the letter P... a box with two compartments for salt and pepper.

The traveler poured a bit of salt into his palm and tossed it over the stones, then added a few pinches of ground black pepper.

The oil began to shimmer, releasing a soft, promising fragrance.

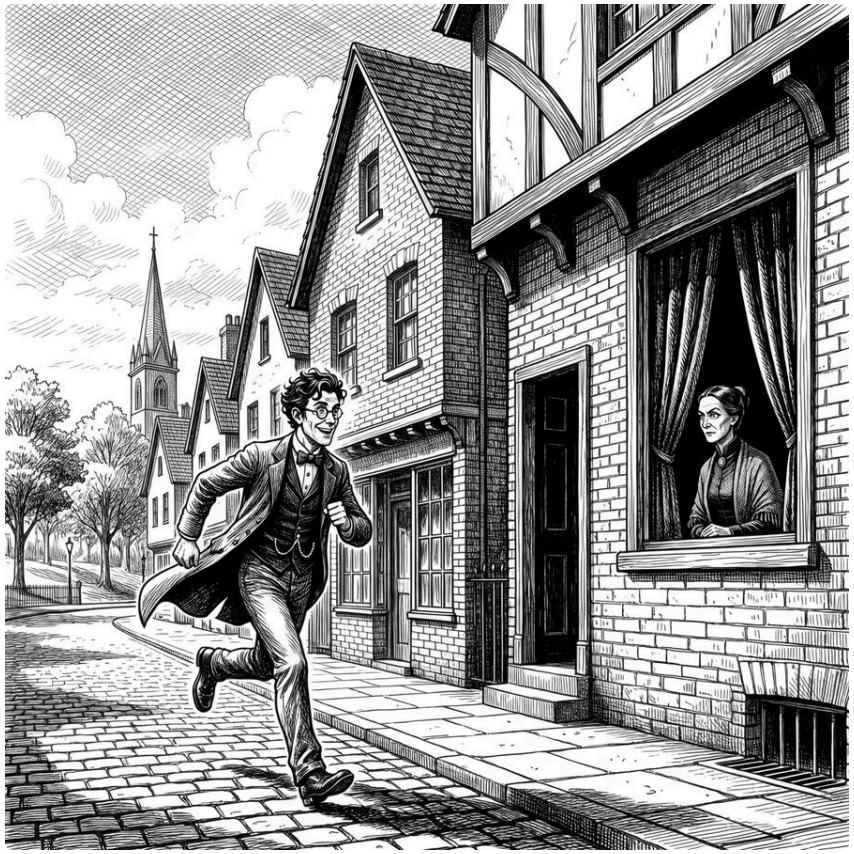

"That does smell delicious," sighed Mr. Inquisitive, watching the oil sizzle.

"Yes," agreed the traveler. "These stones make wonderful soup. Though it could be so much better with a bit of minced onion."

"Minced onion?" replied Mr. Inquisitive. "I have an onion!"

And off he ran toward his home, passing Mrs. Vigilant (VIJ-ih-lunt), who had been watching intently from her window.

"Stone soup!" he called over his shoulder as he ran. "How curious!"

Mr. Elucidate stepped forward. "Allow me to make clear what I believe you are saying. The wonder was never in the stones."

"No," the traveler replied softly. "The stones are ordinary. But each of you... each of you was formed with something particular, something your own. Like threads in a tapestry... when held apart, they seem small. But when woven together, each finding its place, something beautiful appears."

He paused, looking at each face in turn. "Call it design, or providence... but it is how God made us to live. What is woven together begins to feel as though it was always meant to be so."

As the evening grew late and the candles burned low, the traveler began to pack his copper pot. The townsfolk noticed and gathered around.

"Must you go?" asked Mr. Inquisitive.

"There are other towns," the traveler replied gently. "Other people who have forgotten what you remembered tonight."

"But the stones!" said Mrs. Vigilant. "Will you take them with you?"

The traveler smiled. He reached into the pot and lifted out the three smooth stones. They were ordinary... anyone could see that now. Just simple, river-worn stones.

"These stones," he said, "belong here now. Keep them. Remember what they taught you."

As Mrs. Vigilant (VIJ-ih-lunt) approached the traveler, who was stirring the pot, she watched carefully for a few moments.

"Stone soup?" she said slowly, her watchful eyes examining the pot. "What a peculiar notion... soup from stones." She leaned in closer, observing everything. "I have been watching, and I confess I am intrigued."

"Just wait and see," replied the traveler with a smile.

Clatter, rattle, clatter.

Mrs. Vigilant took a deep breath.

"It does smell wonderful," she exclaimed.

"Oh, it will be," responded the traveler. "These three stones come from a unique and special place."

At that moment, Mr. Inquisitive returned with a bowl of minced onion. The traveler thanked him and tossed the onions into the pot. Steam rose immediately, and the aroma wafted past their noses.

Rattle, rattle, clatter.

The onions sizzled and smelled so good. Mr. Inquisitive watched with growing curiosity, while Mrs. Vigilant observed everything carefully.

"The onion," Mrs. Vigilant noted, "has made quite a difference. I can see the steam rising differently now."

When the onions became nearly transparent, the traveler opened the large jug of water and slowly, carefully poured it into the pot. He turned the heat up to medium-high and began to stir once more.

Swoosh. Clunk. Thud. Swoosh.

Young Master Capricious, who had been eating his soup, suddenly stood up. "I have an idea! We should fix the playground! No wait... we should plant flowers! Actually, both! We should do everything!"

The adults exchanged glances. For once, his unpredictable energy seemed exactly right.

"I will ensure we do it properly," said Mrs. Meticulous. "I'll create a detailed plan. Every flower in its proper place, every swing hung at precisely the correct height."

"AND I WILL ANNOUNCE OUR WORK DAYS TO THE WHOLE TOWN!" added Mr. Vociferous.

The traveler watched it all with quiet satisfaction.

As the meal continued, laughter filled the air. Stories were shared. Neighbors learned each other's names for the first time.

Grandmother Prudent looked around and smiled. "It was wise of us to take a chance tonight. We had forgotten how good this feels."

"It's nothing short of a blessing," said Mr. Tantamount. "This soup has achieved what nothing else could... it brought us together."

Little Miss Facetious giggled. "Next time, maybe we can make rock candy together! Get it? Rocks? Like the stones?"

Everyone groaned, but they were smiling.

"I love this!" exclaimed Miss Ardent. "I am so passionate about what has happened here tonight. We must do this again!"

At that moment, Mr. Elucidate (ee-LOO-sih-dayt) and Mrs. Succinct (suk-SINKT) joined the group.

"Excuse me," began Mr. Elucidate, "but may I ask you to explain... so that I may understand fully and completely... what exactly you are doing here in our town square?"

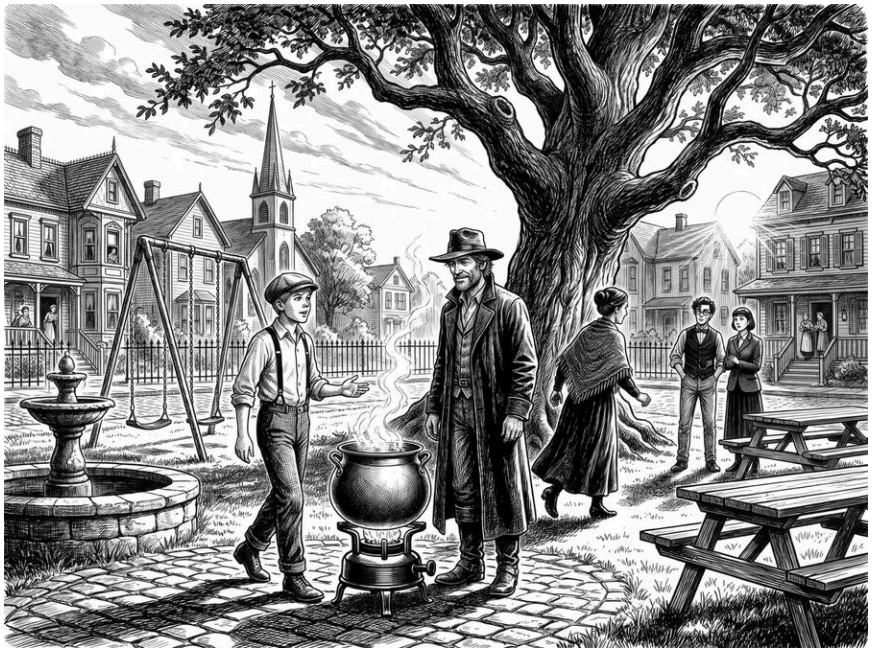

"But please," interrupted Mrs. Succinct, "be brief."

The traveler smiled warmly. "I am making stone soup. These stones," he said, lifting the spoon to reveal them beneath the water, "come from a very special place. They make the most wonderful soup you have ever tasted."

"Fascinating," said Mr. Elucidate (ee-LOO-sih-dayt). "Please, explain further. How do stones create flavor?"

"It is a mystery," said Mrs. Succinct (suk-SINKT). "Obviously."

"The soup," continued the traveler, "is already quite good. But I must confess, it would be even better with some turnips and potatoes."

Mrs. Vigilant's eyes widened. "I have been keeping watch over my garden, and I have turnips! Fine ones, too."

And she hurried off to fetch them.

Young Lucid (LOO-sid), who had been listening from nearby, stepped forward. He was a teenager with clear, thoughtful eyes.

"I understand what you need," he said simply. "Potatoes. I have some at home. I'll return shortly."

His words were so clear and direct that everyone nodded, understanding perfectly.

When Mr. Inquisitive tasted his first spoonful, his eyes widened. "This is the most delicious soup I have ever tasted! How is it possible?"

"I have been watching carefully," said Mrs. Vigilant, "and I believe the answer is simple. We made it together."

Young Lucid nodded. "She's right. The soup is good because everyone gave something."

"Precisely," agreed Mr. Elucidate. "Allow me to explain: when each person contributes what they have, the result is greater than any individual could create alone."

"Community," said Mrs. Succinct. "That's the ingredient."

Before the traveler began to serve, Grandmother Prudent raised her hand.

"Wait," she said. "Before we eat, we should give thanks."

The crowd grew quiet. Some looked uncertain... they had not given thanks for a meal in a very long time.

Grandmother Prudent bowed her head. "Heavenly Father," she said simply, "we are grateful for this food, for these neighbors, and for the stranger who reminded us what we had forgotten. Amen."

"Amen," murmured several voices, some remembering the word for the first time in years.

The traveler smiled softly and then ladled soup into bowl after bowl. Everyone received a portion... the same soup, made from everyone's contribution.

As Mrs. Vigilant and Young Lucid returned with their contributions, more townsfolk began to gather. The aroma of the soup was spreading through the town like a gentle invitation.

Mrs. Vigilant carefully placed her turnips by the pot. "I watched these grow all season," she said. "They are ready."

Young Lucid (LOO-sid) handed over his potatoes. "These will add substance," he explained clearly. "Potatoes give the soup body."

The traveler thanked them both and added the vegetables to the pot. The soup began to bubble and thicken.

"The soup grows richer," observed Mr. Elucidate. "Allow me to clarify: each ingredient builds upon the last."

Mrs. Succinct nodded. "Carrots next. I have them. Back soon."

She was gone and returned in what seemed like moments, carrying a bundle of bright orange carrots.

"Here," she said, handing them over. Nothing more needed to be said.

Mr. Elucidate suddenly raised a finger. "If I may... I believe I understand what this soup requires next. Allow me to fetch cabbage from my kitchen."

He returned shortly, carrying a fresh head of cabbage. "Cabbage," he explained as he handed it over, "adds substance without overwhelming the other flavors. When cooked slowly, it becomes tender and sweet. A most logical addition."

The traveler accepted the meat with gratitude and added it to the pot. The soup bubbled and simmered, filling the air with the most wonderful aroma any of them had ever smelled.

The traveler stepped back and looked at the pot with quiet satisfaction. "The soup is ready."

But something had changed in the park. People who had not spoken to each other in years were standing side by side. Children who usually stared at screens were laughing and chasing each other around the picnic tables. The old picnic tables, unused for so long, were being brushed off and arranged in a great circle.

"SOMEONE GET BOWLS!" shouted Mr. Vociferous. "AND SPOONS! WE FEAST TONIGHT!"

And somehow, bowls and spoons appeared. Tablecloths were spread. Candles were lit as the sun began to set.

"Nearly?" asked Mr. Inquisitive. "What else could it need?"

The traveler stirred the pot thoughtfully. "The soup is wonderful," he said. "Truly wonderful. But if someone happened to have a bit of meat..."

A booming voice rang out across the park.

"MEAT? DID SOMEONE SAY MEAT?"

Mr. Vociferous (voh-SIF-er-us) strode toward the group, his voice carrying so strongly that birds scattered from nearby trees.

"I HAVE MEAT!" he proclaimed. "THE FINEST BEEF YOU HAVE EVER SEEN! I WAS SAVING IT FOR A SPECIAL OCCASION, AND BY THE SOUND AND SMELL OF THINGS, THIS IS THAT OCCASION!"

He thrust forward a package wrapped in brown paper.

"FOR THE SOUP!" Mr. Vociferous (voh-SIF-er-us) announced. "LET IT BE KNOWN THAT MR. VOCIFEROUS CONTRIBUTED!"

Grandmother Prudent (PROO-dent) had been watching from her porch, considering carefully whether to join. Finally, she walked over, moving slowly but with purpose.

"Stone soup," she murmured, peering into the pot with wise eyes. "I have lived many years and never heard of such a thing. And yet..." She paused thoughtfully. "It would be wise to participate. I have broccoli in my kitchen... I was saving it, but perhaps this is what I was saving it for."

The traveler bowed his head respectfully. "Your wisdom is appreciated."

As Grandmother Prudent (PROO-dent) went to fetch her broccoli, Mr. Elucidate took the opportunity to explain to the growing crowd what was happening.

"You see," he began, "the traveler has created what one might call a collaborative culinary endeavor. Each person who contributes an ingredient becomes part of the soup's creation. The stones, I believe, serve as a catalyst... not for flavor, but for fellowship."

"Well said," murmured Mrs. Vigilant, who had noticed the same thing but appreciated hearing it explained.

"Too many words," said Mrs. Succinct. "But yes. Correct."

Grandmother Prudent returned with her broccoli and added it to the pot. "It is wise to share what we have," she said. "One never knows when generosity will return to us."

The soup was now rich and colorful, filled with vegetables of every kind. Nearly everyone had gathered in the old park.

Mrs. Meticulous (meh-TIK-yoo-lus) arrived last among the vegetable-bringers, carrying fresh parsley. She examined the pot carefully.

"The soup appears nearly complete," she observed, "but it lacks a finishing touch. Parsley... finely chopped, precisely distributed... will add both color and freshness."

From her apron pocket, she produced a small cutting board and paring knife. She chopped the parsley with remarkable precision, each piece exactly the same size, and sprinkled it over the soup in a perfect pattern.

"There," Mrs. Meticulous (meh-TIK-yoo-lus) said with satisfaction. "Now it is nearly perfect."

Miss Ardent (AR-dent) had been watching from her family's porch, her heart swelling with emotion. She could contain herself no longer.

"This is beautiful!" she exclaimed as she approached, nearly running. "What you are doing here... all of you... it fills me with such joy! I am passionate about this town, and to see us finally coming together..."

She wiped a tear from her eye.

"I have tomatoes," Miss Ardent (AR-dent) said, her voice full of feeling. "The most beautiful, ripe tomatoes from my mother's garden. They deserve to be part of something this meaningful."

She handed them over with both hands, as if presenting a gift of great importance.

"Thank you," said the traveler gently. "Your passion makes the soup warmer."

Mr. Tantamount (TAN-tuh-mount) arrived next, carrying a head of cauliflower. He paused at the edge of the gathering, taking in the scene... the steam, the laughter, the unlikely crowd.

"I had thought to wait," he admitted, "until I had something grander to offer. But I see now that being here matters as much as what I bring."

He pulled a small knife from his pocket and began breaking the cauliflower into florets, cutting each one with deliberate care.

"Every gift given freely," Mr. Tantamount (TAN-tuh-mount) said quietly, "carries the same weight."

The traveler watched him work, then nodded. "You see what others often miss."

A small giggle came from behind Mrs. Vigilant. Little Miss Facetious (fuh-SEE-shus) peeked out, her eyes twinkling with mischief.

"Stone soup?" she said. "I thought stones were for skipping across ponds, not for eating!" She laughed at her own joke.

The adults smiled. Her humor was a welcome break from the seriousness.

"I have radishes," Little Miss Facetious (fuh-SEE-shus) announced. "They're a bit spicy, like me!"

She ran off and returned with a handful of bright red radishes, which she presented with an exaggerated bow.

"For the soup!" she declared. "May it be as delightfully surprising as I am!"

"Thank you," said the traveler, trying not to laugh. "The soup appreciates your spirit."

Young Master Capricious (kuh-PRISH-us) appeared suddenly, as if from nowhere. One moment he was not there; the next, he was standing right beside the pot, peering in with intense interest.

"I want to help!" he announced. Then, just as quickly: "Actually, I want to watch. No, wait... I'll get mushrooms! I love mushrooms! Or do I? Yes, I do! Today I do!"

And he dashed away before anyone could respond.

Mr. Inquisitive watched him go with curiosity. "Where did he come from?" he asked.

"Who knows?" said Mrs. Succinct.

Young Master Capricious (kuh-PRISH-us) returned moments later with an assortment of mushrooms, some still with dirt on them.

"I found these! They're perfect! Or maybe not perfect, but interesting! The soup will be surprised!"